The aim of this combination of programs is to identify a huge number of potential molecular disease-causing mutations in the human genome, and specifically to identify single base-pair substitutions in human genes. This is done by replicating the human genome with the help of DNA polymerases, with the aid of site-specific mutagens, and observing which specific base mutations occur. In a large-scale mutation scanning, about 2-5.5 million bases in the entire human genome are tested. Biological instruments Healthtree uses a unique technology for its functionality. In brief, the underlying technology relies on the sequencing of individual DNA molecules.

This way, the user can find mutations and variations of a certain disease. Every single base or base pair is then read through the underlying biological technology. The information gathered is then used to help users find the perfect biological solution to improve their health. This technology is also used in clinical research. The National Institute of Health (NIH) is primarily responsible for this process, and supports the development and scientific conclusions that are put together from sequencing.

Biological drugs A human genome sequence may allow for a drug to be produced, that can specifically target a genetic mutation. This way, a medication would act specifically on the cause of a certain disease. Imaging Concurrent to sequencing,

Healthtree also offers a medical imaging option. This technology allows for the real-time observation of a cell, a specific DNA of an organism, or even a whole organism. This way, the viewer can look at specific mutations or even harmful characteristics. This technology can be used to see whether a cell is growing in a specific way. Publications In 2019, the French National Center for Scientific Research (CNRS) initiated a first concerted research project on the framework of the fundamental sequencing of the human genome. Healthtree will be an integral part of this project and will focus on the thorough sequencing of the human genome. In the near future, Healthtree will also be responsible for the technologies used to sequence the human genome. After all, Healthtree offers a comprehensive service of sequencing and research. It is not limited to the service of sequencing DNA but rather offers a full service of mutations and variations.

Healthtree invites all researchers to use the technology that is available and find the result for their research. 50b96ab0b6
